from the west side of the room. As the passage looked promising I had great expectations of getting over the mass of rock, that I had failed to any way through, but all my hopes were blasted when I climbed up the passage and found a round smooth pocket in the rock. There was no hole out of it big enough for a to squeeze through except the one that I came in by. I had enough courage left to try again and after I had climbed down out of my roost I discovered a peculiarity that was new to me without exception. There is a great depression or hole in the floor of the North end of the room and into this the rocks had tumbled until they had formed the side of a mountain. I went down into the depression and noticed that the fall had filled it about half full. At the foot of the Mountain I discovered a passage leading down. After going through this I came into good sized room but waited for help before I made any further explorations. When two of the came through the hole I left one at the entrance of the room with instructions to wait there until we got back.
